

MIT cuts ties with Walter Lewin after online harassment probe

Institute revokes emeritus title, removes online courses of popular physics professor who starred in viral videos

By Leon Lin
NEWS EDITOR

MIT is cutting ties with retired professor Walter Lewin after determining that the physicist, whose lectures had made him a beloved teacher and minor Internet star, had sexually harassed at least one student online.

The woman was taking one of Lewin's classes on edX, the online learning platform started by Harvard and MIT.

MIT said Monday that it had launched an investigation immediately after she filed a complaint in October.

MIT officials reviewed "detailed materials" provided by the complainant, who also presented "information about interactions between Lewin and other women online learners," according to Monday's announcement. The investigation also included interviews with the complainant and Lewin.

MIT has revoked his title as professor emeritus, Provost Martin A. Schmidt PhD '88 said.

MIT is also removing Lewin's lecture videos and other course materials from edX and MIT OpenCourseWare indefinitely, "in the interest of preventing any further inappropriate behavior."

Schmidt said that MIT's actions were "part of a process of a complete separation from Walter," though he also said those actions were "probably the extent of it" given that Lewin had retired.

"Given Dr. Lewin's long career on our campus and contributions as an educator, taking this step is painful," Schmidt wrote to MIT's faculty.

"However, based on my careful review of the findings of the investigation and my conversations with the Physics Department leadership, School Deans, and other faculty leaders, I believe that harassment occurred, that our response is appropriate, and that explaining this matter publicly is necessary."

Schmidt declined to comment on whether MIT would also investigate Lewin's past at MIT.

U.S. CTO Smith to be 2015 speaker

Presidential advisor and former Google exec will address graduates

By Austin Hess
EDITOR IN CHIEF

Megan Smith '86, chief technology officer of the United States and a former Google executive, will be MIT's commencement speaker for the Class of 2015.

Smith began her role as U.S. CTO — technically as an advisor to the president from within the Office of Science and Technology Policy — in September, the third person to hold the position since its creation in 2009. She had previously served as a vice president of business development at Google and helped lead GoogleX, the company's experimental wing.

Smith was a mechanical engineering major as an undergraduate and completed her master's thesis at the Media Lab. She served as a member of the MIT Corporation from 1988 to 1993 and 2006 to 2014, according to an MIT press release.

In an interview with The Tech, Smith said that her role was to "advise the president and his team on how to harness the power of technology, innovation, and data on behalf of the nation," adding that she saw herself as a "technology renovation officer."

Smith said a major focus of her current role involves advising on technology policy, particularly regarding regulation reform.

Technology companies like Google have frequently been at odds with government regulators in recent years on issues as diverse as online privacy, net neutrality, unmanned aerial vehicles, and patent reform. Smith said part of her role is to work "across government" to influence policy on such matters.

"We try to help bridge the conversation and bring some of these really talented American innovators together with these actually quite talented regulators so that they're having a conversation," she said, adding that the goal was to "adapt our regulation to make it possible for people to keep moving the bar."

Smith said her responsibilities also include increasing technological innovation in government projects, even though she does not directly oversee most federal technology-related efforts. "We're trying to bring more technical talent into government," she said. "The websites haven't been as strong as they need to be, and we need more people to come and be part of this amazing service that we can provide for the American people."

Smith said she also hoped to see more people write applications to use what she described as increasingly open government data.

According to Smith, another "very big focus of the CTO role" is promoting technological innovation and careers to the public, including increasing diversity in technology-related fields. She said her office is involved in several efforts of outreach to women and girls and to members of underrepresented minority groups.

Smith said, "My class at MIT was about 20 percent women undergrads, and it's so incredible to see the progress that MIT has [made], but we're still struggling in some of the majors and really need ... to work together to fix that."

In explaining the lasting disparities, she said, "Much of it comes from unconscious bias that we need to overcome," adding that she hoped new approaches informed by behavioral science could make "everyone feel like they belong" in computer science and technology classrooms across the country.

Smith said she hopes to engage in "digital conversations" with students to learn about their interests leading up to her June 5, 2015 speech at the 149th Commencement exercises.

She said she thought that MIT students would end up engaging in "heroic engineering." She added, "The most important thing is to do a range of different things. The students graduating today are going to live ... possibly past 100 years. So there's so many different adventures that people should get up to."

Course 2 senior Spencer R. Wilson receives a 2015 Marshall Scholarship

Wilson plans to study engineering and mathematics at Cambridge University through prestigious program

By Angela Leong
STAFF REPORTER

Last week, Spencer R. Wilson '15 was named a Marshall Scholar, joining 30 others nationwide who will receive a full scholarship for two years of graduate study in the United Kingdom.

Wilson, a mechanical engineering major at MIT, is planning to pursue an MPhil in engineering and a MAST in applied mathematics at Cambridge University. Just last month, an MIT alumnus and two seniors won Rhodes scholarships to pursue graduate study at Oxford University.

In an interview with The Tech, Wilson said that he had "always been a maker, a tinkerer, a builder." His interest in mechanical engineering stemmed from growing up with parents who pushed him "to do fun projects," including building instruments, skateboards, and catapults.

A "really, really intense" summer internship at Otherlab in San Francisco last year completely changed his view of what it meant to be an engineer, he said. According to MIT, Wilson worked on bike-fabrication technology at Otherlab, with the goal of enabling people to easily build customized bicycles.

A subsequent stint at MIT's Center for Bits and Atoms, under director Neil Gershenfeld, further "reinforced that idea that if you understand the fundamental mathematics behind what's going on, you can do a lot more hands-on." He summed up his academic pursuits at Cambridge University as "pairing theory with the experimental, which is what MIT is all about," and added that he hoped "to bring that MIT ideal to Cambridge."

Wilson said the most difficult part of the scholarship application process, which spanned several months, was the perseverance required. "You're really committing to something, and second-guessing that commitment."

"You're specifying something, you're saying, 'This little chunk right here, out of all these chunks — that's what I want to do,'" he said, adding that during the application process he often asked himself, "Is that really what my life's work is going to be?"

Wilson described his parents as "infinitely supportive" during the application process. He said he "never once expected to get the scholarship," and "treated it the same way as I treated applying to MIT," trusting the judgement of the selection committee.

While waiting to hear back from the selection committee the night after his interview, he forgot that he had ordered a pizza and answered a call which he thought was from the selection committee. It was "pretty soul-crushing" when it turned out to be from the pizza delivery man.

When he did get the scholarship, he "couldn't stop pacing." Wilson described receiving the good news last Wednesday morning as "unreal" and compared it to "getting into MIT — one of those moments where you just can't believe it."

On top of his technical passions, Wilson is also a film buff whose creative outlets are watching films, analyzing films, and writing screenplays.

Nor'easter to bring heavy rain

STAFF METEOROLOGIST

Another nor'easter is poised to strike the Eastern Seaboard today, bringing high winds and a mix of wintry precipitation to the Institute. The storm, which as of Monday night was beginning to form off the coast of the Carolinas, will quickly intensify as it moves up the coast this afternoon, with the center of the storm forecast to move onshore over New England overnight tonight. While nor'easters often mean big snowstorms for the Boston area, the track of this particular storm, combined with its insufficient access to early-season Arctic air, will turn it into a mostly-rain event for most of our region. While today may start out with a mix of rain, snow, and sleet, the precipitation will change over to all rain as the day progresses and the temperature climbs into the 40s (°F). Rain and wind will become heavy at times this afternoon as the storm strengthens and moves toward shore. In fact, total liquid precipitation from the storm may be in excess of 2 inches. As such, the National Weather Service had issued a Wind Advisory, Flood Watch, and Coastal Flood Advisory for the Boston area as of this writing.

Today: A morning wintry mix changing to rain in the afternoon, with rain becoming heavy at times. High 45°F (7°C). Winds E at 15-25 mph, with higher gusts possible.

Tonight: Rain tapering off, low 39°F (4°C). Winds NE at 10-15 mph.

Tomorrow: A chance of rain, high 47°F (8°C). Winds NE at 5-10 mph.

Thursday: A chance of rain, highs in the low 40s °F (6°C).

Friday: Mostly cloudy, highs around 40°F (4°C).

MIT severs ties with prof in ‘painful’ move

came a full professor in 1974. In the decades that followed he collected award after award for his undergraduate teaching.

Through OpenCourseWare and YouTube, Lewin’s lectures and physics demonstrations have reached millions.

“Professor Lewin delivers his lectures with the panache of Julia Child bringing French cooking to amateurs and the zany theatricality of YouTube’s greatest hits,” The New York Times wrote in 2007. “With his wiry grayish-brown hair, his tortoiseshell glasses and his intensity, Professor Lewin is the iconic brilliant scientist ... he is at once larger than life and totally accessible.”

Lewin went on to star in viral videos of him drawing dotted lines on blackboards and swinging on steel balls suspended from the ceiling.

And then in 2013, Lewin helped launch online versions of his classes on edX. Among those who enrolled: the woman who would lodge the sexual harassment complaint this past October.

By Monday evening, at least some of Lewin’s classes had been taken down from edX, MIT OpenCourseWare, and MIT OpenCourseWare’s Youtube channel.

MIT is keeping some of Lewin’s lecture videos available on ocw2.mit.edu until the end of the semester. “We realize that some of you may have been using some materials from the OCV versions of the course as you prepare for your exams,” physics department administrators wrote in an email to students in an introductory physics class.

“Students place tremendous trust in their teachers,” MIT President L. Rafael Reif said in a statement. “Deserving that trust is among our most fundamental obligations. We must take the greatest care that everyone who comes to us for knowledge and instruction, whether in classrooms or online, can count on MIT as a safe and respectful place to learn.”

An email requesting comment, sent to an MIT address that Lewin has previously used in communications with The Tech, could not be delivered Monday.

He encouraged “anyone to have your technical [side] but embrace something purely creative,” saying that “bouncing between those two, and then sometimes letting them join together is really fun.” He is headed to India this January to make a short documentary about manufacturing — an experience he characterized as “film-making but also doing engineering.”

He advised future applicants to talk to Kim Bernard of MIT’s Global Education & Career Development (GECD) office, describing her guidance as “not coaching,” but “structured soul-searching.”

“Figure out what your values are, and let that guide you,” he said. “Don’t pick something because it makes sense. It needs to make sense, but it also needs to be something you are passionate about. You have to feel it. I think that why I was successful in this, was because I can talk about this stuff with a smile and I get charged because I really care about it a lot.”

Opening up

When my trust and I were broken

Anonymous

Editor's note: This piece contains descriptions of sexual assault.

As trust is difficult to come by, we humans barely ever share our deepest, darkest secrets with anyone. But what happens when we cross that barrier? We give somebody the opportunity to hurt us.

Dear reader,

Imagine you are a happy girlfriend, with a boyfriend anyone would dream to have. Remember days when he stayed up nights to see you. Remember times when he would do anything simply for a little attention from you. You fell in love with that boy. You fell in love with a boy who wanted a second chance. You fell in love with a boy who wanted to be loved. And then there was no going back.

With time you unraveled each other's stories. He let you into his heart, the heart of a boy who missed his family before it broke apart. You told him about yourself, the girl who was sexually abused as a child, whom he understood and embraced. He shared with you his struggles with religion, and you respected his opinions no matter how different they were from your own.

He thought you were the most beautiful girl and the best girlfriend one could ask for. You used to go out of your way to put a smile on his face, be it with small surprises, with food, with helping him academically or just understanding him when his own family and friends couldn't. He did the same for you. He was there for you when you needed him. Your pain was his pain. He listened to you complain about your life and how terrible it was, but your life was not horrible at all; only now can you see how much worse it can become.

You remember when he used to run your fingers through your hair and kiss your forehead. This time he pulled harshly. You remember when he used to caress your arms with his fingertips. This time he used his hands to hold yours still. You remember when he placed a kiss on your lips and looked into your eyes. This time he was looking at the headboard while gnashing his teeth. You remember in the midst of all of that, he would stop and tell you: "I love you; you were the best thing that happened to me at MIT!"

This time you waited, but nothing came. You were right beside him crying for hours, waiting, hoping that maybe he would want to pull you into a hug after he was done. You told yourself it was okay, nothing happened, and he did not mean it. He just forgot. You waited and waited. But you could only make up excuses for so long. You could not keep him on that pedestal forever. You realized it was not about love anymore. It was about lust and hunger.

You did not realize when the line between love and lust was crossed. You question yourself, was it your fault? You trusted him, did you not? You let him in. You conclude that it is your fault and you cannot tell anyone. You torment yourself day and night. You question yourself day and night. And he sits on a pedestal. He sits there and watches you deteriorate, piece by piece. And you wonder, did he hate you?

He told you he did not hate you, he was just not in love with you as much as before. He told you he still cared for you and owed it to you to be there for you. But those words, those promises, meant nothing the moment he ran away when you got pregnant. He ran away from responsibility, the responsibility of a promise. He tried to convince you he had to leave. He does not want to deal with it so he left you alone and scared, not knowing what is right or wrong.

You looked in the mirror and all you saw was ugliness. You wanted to live your life, but the only thing alive in you was loneliness. You shoved your face into the pillows so no one could hear you scream. You caused physical pain so maybe the demons inside you would let you sleep. You were cheating on your body. It was not yours anymore. It was used and abused and a part of it was gone. With it went away your self-esteem. With it went away the girl who was strong, independent, loving, and the warmth of the room.

He would give you the bare minimum time necessary for you to stay safe, but you wanted to die. Yes you wanted to kill yourself but never had the audacity to actually do it. You are scared about everything — about talking to him, asking for his attention, going to sleep. He made you think your reaction was uncommon and that you should be fine by now, but you are not.

He told his friends that you cannot get over him, skipping over everything horrible he did to you. If you revealed it all, they would feel bad for you. People would sympathize with you, they would tell you it is going to be okay. But you know that no one really knows or understands or ever will. Every moment you spend is in anxiety, because you do not know when it happened, but you are shattered; somewhere along the lines he managed to break you into tiny pieces — pieces that are beyond repair, pieces that cannot be put back together. You are tortured every day with the thought of being left alone, of being used, but you did not want to be that girl.

He comes back, and pretends everything is okay, and says he would give you another chance, because he wants to help you. But again it is nothing but a lie.

This is my story. And to the one who left, listen to me and listen clearly:

I do not want to be the girl that was raped. I do not want to be the girl who was left all alone, pregnant. I do not want to be the girl who was used because she trusted you. I imagine you, imagining me, and that is my salvation. I want to tell you, I want to scream to the world, that I am not okay because what you did is not okay and it will never be okay, no matter how much you try to avoid me.

I cannot just "get over it and move on" as you suggested. I am not okay, and it is your fault. I will not trust anybody and it is your fault. You were not doing me a favor by pretending to be there for me. Neither were you telling yourself the truth when you imagined everything is fine. Let me break it to you: it wasn't. I wasn't fine. I am not fine! I will never be put back together and it is your fault. You denying all of this to yourself and your friends will not change the truth. What you did was wrong and you will have to live with it for the rest of your life, and I pity you.

And to you all reading my story:

It was supposed to be on us, MIT. Correct? Where were you when I needed that friend? Where were you when I wanted to pick up that knife and scratch every part of my body because it disgusted me? Why did you say, "It happens, move on with your life"? Because I am still stuck in that night, crying and waiting. I am still stuck in that week when I was left alone. I am still stuck in those months when I would quiver in the corner of my bed and scream in the showers.

You will never know how it feels. So just think before you speak because I have heard all of that from him as well. He made excuses to run away. So think before you say something because those words construct the fine line between you and him.

But I live — I do not let the disappointment take over me because I am waiting, waiting for the day when he realizes the magnitude of the repercussions of his actions. I know he will come back and on that day I will have tears in my eyes, care in my heart, and strength in my body. I will have everything except the one thing this man will come for: forgiveness.

TAKE A STAND

More than a kick-off

Understanding It's On Us, MIT

By Chacha Durazo

Hi MIT community!

I'm Chacha and I work in the Title IX Student Working Group. From various discussions we've had with friends and colleagues, I thought I'd take a minute to clarify a few things about the group, our It's On Us, MIT campaign, and how you can get involved if you want to.

In November, over 1800 MIT community members joined us for the It's On Us, MIT campus kick-off. You may remember us as slightly overzealous individuals handing out stickers, buttons, shirts, and bottles in Lobby 10, but as those who contributed to the more than 1,800 signatures soon learned, we stood for a whole lot more than free swag. The kick-off launched the first part of the It's On Us, MIT campaign that the Title IX Student Working Group is organizing on campus.

You may be wondering, "What is the Title IX Student Working Group?" Good question! It is a coalition of activists, advocates, survivors, allies, friends, and student leaders (both undergraduate and graduate). We bring together our student groups' resources in order to address problems facing this campus and hope that by sharing our collective resources and insight, we can make strides towards change. We are guided by VPR, the Title IX office, and evidence-based best practices. We also communicate with high-level MIT administrators about student efforts and attitudes.

There are many ways to combat sexual assault on campus; some involve reforming the campus disciplinary processes, while others focus on improving the support systems for survivors. In the Title IX Student Working Group, we are able to approach the issue of sexual assault from multiple angles. Our members represent student groups with a variety of interests, some of which are specifically related to sexual assault; others are more broadly concerned with student life. The It's On Us, MIT campaign goal is to teach MIT community members about sexual assault on campus as well as to foster a campus-wide attitude which takes sexual assault seriously.

The kick-off showed that many people on campus care about preventing sexual assault. The Title IX Student Working Group is now planning educational events and workshops for the MIT community, and we look forward to creating more opportunities for continued dialogue with other passionate students and the administration. Enacting tangible change on campus requires making sexual assault something we are all actively involved in preventing. The amount of support It's On Us has garnered is inspiring for a future where MIT institutional change can occur with the support of its student body.

In an effort to show our support, the Title IX Student Working Group created a video modeled after other It's On Us campaigns across the country. This video, found on our website, is not the MIT video, but rather the Title IX Student Working Group's video that defines what the pledge meant to the members of our organization. We encourage groups across campus to create their own pledge and make a video in which their members take said pledge.

The It's On Us, MIT pledge is a list of concrete ideas that we think the whole community can take to heart, and which will inspire individuals to do what they can to help make MIT a safer community for everyone. We encourage dorms, student governments, departments, clubs, sports teams, offices, labs, and any other organization to think about what the pledge means for their own community and to share their personalized version via video. If you would like to share your video, you can send it to us at itsonusmit@gmail.com, and we will post it on the It's On Us, MIT YouTube channel. We look forward to seeing your creative adaptations.

In the future, we hope to build a community in which students feel empowered to call a rape joke unacceptable, survivors are supported by their peers, and not being a part of the solution is considered being part of the problem. The kick-off was just the first step with many more to come, such as our Bystander Intervention workshop that was held last week. A calendar with all of our events will soon be available on our website: itsonus.mit.edu. We invite anyone who wants to work with or stay informed about the Title IX Student Working Group to please email us at itsonusmit@gmail.com.

Thank you all for your immense support, Chacha Durazo on behalf of the TIX Student Working Group

Cambridge and Boston protesters rally against police brutality

Top: A protest against police brutality was held on Boston Common on Thursday night, Dec. 4. Protesters forced the shut down of the surrounding streets and the Park Street T station, and several people were arrested. Bottom: Demonstrators lay on the ground for a “die-in” that was held at the Harvard Memorial Church at noon on Sunday, Dec. 7. Many protestors could be seen wearing masks with the phrase “We can’t breathe” written on them, in reference to the last words spoken by Eric Garner, a man killed in an encounter with NYPD police earlier this year.

2.009 class presents capstone projects

Students in 2.009 (Product Engineering Processes) presented final projects on Monday to potential funders, the MIT community, and guests. The theme to inspire this year’s designs was “adventure.”

Live music and videos about 2.009’s students, mentors, and past projects were interspersed throughout the show. Each team gave an eight-minute presentation showcasing its product, giving technical background, and discussing market predictions, followed by five minutes of audience questions.

The Pink Team presented Origin, a durable, lightweight wristband meant to help skiers locate each other on the slopes independent of cellular service. Origin implements its own GPS network, and allows for syncing with fellow skiers and “pinging” to check in and call for help if needed.

Terrainer, demonstrated by the Blue Team, is a motor, controller, and phone app set that can be installed in a regular bike to provide varying resistance like an exercise machine. Bikers can customize their workout without sacrificing the outdoor experience.

Changing the focus from sports to medical devices, the Silver Team designed Contour, a below-the-knee adjustable prosthetic that uses granular jamming technology in its socket to conform to the user, rather than the user having to adjust to it.

The Purple Team presented Upbeat, a drum kit with lights on the rims that illuminate to indicate which drum to hit when. The product also includes an app to show written music, and the system carries both “practice” and “compose” settings.

Wali, the Green Team’s project, is a hands-free baby gate that projects a conical sensor to detect approaching figures within the standard adult height range. If it detects such a figure, it unlocks. Wali is meant to replace ugly and inconvenient manual baby gates.

The Red Team demonstrated Otto, an automatic longboard brake that engages when there is no weight on the board in order to prevent boards from rolling away when a skater falls off. Escaped boards may hit pedestrians or run into traffic, and children often chase after their escaped boards without paying attention to where they are going.

The Yellow Team designed Sunflower, a low-cost heating bassinet for premature children who cannot keep themselves warm. The bassinet can maintain heat without power for up to 40 minutes, crucial for hospitals with unreliable power supply, and is transparent to allow for concurrent jaundice phototherapy.

Finally, the Orange Team presented KOACH, a heavy bag containing a system that records punch force and factors in height, weight, and boxing experience to develop an individualized score for a boxer. Implementing KOACH in gyms allows for competitions that transcend physical and skill differences and do not involve actual combat.

Because of the “adventure” theme, the students presented 2.009 Professor David Wallace PhD ’94 with signed and colored penguins from the cartoon “Adventure Time” at the end of the presentation.
